The intentional translation of points into significant basis vectors can be used to extract useful features from the data.

Noise isn't very useful, but it does tell you how inaccurate your model fit is.

If you encode data (points) as being along the line (model) or away from the line — in orthogonal terms, you can use the dot product and vector projection to transform the datapoint as a combination of those basises.